Relax!

Anxiety and worry can cause problems such as insomnia, tiredness, and an inability to concentrate. If you are constantly anxious and unable to relax, you should seek professional advice. If, however, your anxiety level only rises on certain occasions, such as before an important meeting or exam, relax. Here are some simple self-help techniques which can ease your worries.

1 Schedule "worry time"

Worrying about things that may never happen or that we can't control can be a huge waste of time. Don't let concerns get into your thoughts and rob you of time you could be thinking about issues you can actually do something about. Scheduling a time to worry every day can be a way of limiting how much you worry about things. Choose a set time and stick to it. 20-30 minutes a day should be enough.

2 Practice breathing

Learning how to breathe well and to control our breathing can be much more complex than we imagine. However, practice can help us gain control of our breathing – and this will reduce stress and relax your body and mind.

3 Keep a diary of thoughts

If you write down how you feel when you are worried or stressed, you might be able to identify potentially irrational, unreasonable behavior or thinking. Writing down your thoughts and emotions can help you find out why you feel this way, enabling you to recognize patterns of behavior, thoughts, and things that cause your stress.

4 Cut down on screen time in the evening

Screen time can fill our brains with too much information, which doesn't help us achieve a state of relaxation. If you turn off all screens a few hours before going to bed, this allows your brain to gently relax and find peace.
